Dopesheet: An American-flagged ship unloaded over 16,000 metric tons of food supplies to North Korea last week, one of the last shipments of U.S. aid following Pyongyang's call for an end to all humanitarian assistance.

The World Food Programme (WFP) will shutter its food enrichment factories in North Korea from November, the first major step toward winding down operations meant to feed 6.5 million of the country's most at-risk people. The U.N. programme has provided food aid to North Korea since 1995.

Food supplies have improved in impoverished North Korea since as many as 2.5 million people died in a famine that peaked in 1995.

But 7 percent of its 22.5 million people are believed still starving and 37 percent chronically malnourished.

The United Nations has appealed to Pyongyang to reverse its September decision to stop taking food aid by the end of the year and only accept development assistance out of concern of its children and others in danger of starvation.

The North will still accept direct aid from South Korea, which provides its neighbour with massive amounts of rice with far fewer monitoring visits than the WFP.
